Tuesday December 10th 2019 Teachers' activity: " How to present your interpersonal skills in your resume"

Number of participants: 20+

Duration: 60 mins

Teachers from neighbouring schools attended a lecture on the importance of interpersonal skills in students' CVs.

During the lecture teachers were able to identify what we call interpersonal skills and why they are important in today's workplace; sometimes valued equally to a degree.

The quality of a teacher's lecture or teaching methods can be significantly enhanced by the quality of their interpersonal skills. Teachers need to possess a number of skills in the teaching profession and include communication, empathy, positive motivation, effective and positive body language and humor.

By means of presentation, interaction and experiential practice, teachers had an opportunity to discover how to empower their students, teach them active listening, communication, collaboration, dependability, conflict resolution.

What was particularly stressed was the fact that today's modern workplace requires that job seekers include and highlight those skills in their resumes. So the purpose of this lecture was to show teachers ways to present their interpersonal qualities through their CVs and then pass this new knowledge onto their students.
